Elevens Millions Didn't Scare

The Dominion Travel Bureau says, "Fear of non-existent border barriers" accounts for a drop of more than two millions in the number of United States tourists who came to Canada in 1939. The tourists who came to Canada in 1939 were 100,000 less than those who came with the tourists for the first three-quarters of last year.

This is a polite way of saying that the campaign carried on by certain interests in the United States to keep tourists from coming to Canada has been successful. The prospective tourist was told, through such publicity mediums as would lend themselves to the deception, that a tourist who came to Canada was liable to be conscripted, to have his money confiscated, to be arrested and refused by the public and seized by the authorities when he attempted to return. Heaven knows what he may have been told in private conversation, as to the dangers and harm caused by him beyond the Canadian border.

It is highly to the credit of the intelligence of the American public that this fraudulent campaign did not dissuade still more from visiting the Dominion. More than eleven million tourists came to Canada. None of them suffered any of the outrages listed, any or other. They were welcomed as usual, treated courteously, and invited to come again. Their personal testimony will count for something in the bogey-makers get busy again next spring.

Italians Cheer Greek Victory

The Greeks and their allies were not the only parties who celebrated the fall of Rethymno. The Italian public, in an Athens street, threw their light on the heads of the Italian soldiers, and suggested what may be the reaction at home if Il Duce's military adventures abroad continue to back-fire.

When news of the capture of Koritsa was told to the Greeks, who were at the Greek capital, they scattered out in the streets of the Italian soldiers, and suggested what may be the reaction at home if Il Duce's military adventures abroad continue to back-fire.

Police traffic officers deserve hearty commendation for visiting the city schools and showing the little folks films which vividly illustrate street dangers, and show how to avoid them. The Italian public, in the streets of the Italian soldiers, and suggested what may be the reaction at home if Il Duce's military adventures abroad continue to back-fire.

The forces sent to invade Greece were pitted troops. They may be assumed to be more predominantly Fascist than the army in general or the civilian population of Italy. Yet the capture of Rethymno, an invasion hitherto unknown to the world, is a source of joy among the prisoners, on a scale large enough and spirited enough to threaten a war. Quite obviously these Italian soldiers did not want to fight the Greeks, did not approve the invasion, and hope it will fail.

If this sentiment exists among Il Duce's front line troops, it is something more than a remote probability that it exists equally or more strongly among the reserve troops, the sailors, the airmen, and Italy's civilian populace.

This may explain why Mussolini has called only one million men to the colors and says he will not call to any more. Maybe he is afraid to put more in their hands!

of Canadian mail en route to Britain that has gone to the bottom. The Post Office department has in fact been deluged with complaints from all parts of the Dominion, and the non-airline passengers to Canadian ports, the old lands. And with complaints also that there have been delays, sometimes long delays, in delivery of mail that did get through.

Both non-delivery and delayed-delivery are important in the difficulties of maintaining a trans-oceanic service in war time. Naturally there is anxiety among our men overseas when expected mails do not reach them on time, or fail to reach them at all. And worry on the part of their friends whose letters and gifts have been lost or held up. But these things are inevitable, and will have to be borne with patience.

Ships do not sail regularly now, as they did in peacetime. The departure of trans-Atlantic mail planes have been frequently postponed, sometimes repeatedly postponed, for one reason or another. And occasionally, an enemy raider sinks a mail ship.

That should not be a cause for alarm.

It is not easy to believe that such a proposal could be made in the House of Commons without some prearrangement with the United States. One would be inclined to think that this formal proposal would be made at the official consumption of an agreement that was already signed, sealed and delivered.

This is all guesswork, of course, as these things have to be. But if the United States should consent to the international implications of such a proposal, it would be significant.

It is officially the property of King Christian of Denmark. Hitler has declared King Christian deposed and his possessions forfeit. Thus, Hitler has inferentially laid claim to Denmark.

If the United States should march in, it would be occupying territory regarded by Hitler as German. And that would be an act of war. *

From The News

By Harold L. Weir

It is announced that a proposal will be made in the British House of Commons that the United States be invited to occupy Iceland or to share its occupation with Great Britain.

Ever since the seizure of Denmark by Germany last spring, Canadian troops have been stationed in the northern island. Prime Minister Mackenzie King has publicly laid down the principle that, for the purposes of defence, Iceland is to be regarded as an "outpost of Canada."

It is not easy to believe that such a proposal could be made in the House of Commons without some prearrangement with the United States. One would be inclined to think that this formal proposal would be made at the official consumption of an agreement that was already signed, sealed and delivered.

This is all guesswork, of course, as these things have to be. But if the United States should consent to the international implications of such a proposal, it would be significant.

It is officially the property of King Christian of Denmark. Hitler has declared King Christian deposed and his possessions forfeit. Thus, Hitler has inferentially laid claim to Denmark.

If the United States should march in, it would be occupying territory regarded by Hitler as German. And that would be an act of war. *

The speculation is advanced that Hitler's alliance with the Balkans may preclude a great pincer-like drive down the east and west coasts of Northern Africa.

A movement down to Dakar would afford a suspicious jumping-off place for any direct attack on the Suez Canal. The best service towards peace at this time is to keep root out the evil spirit of Hitlerism.

Such an expedition, of course, would be directed against the Italian parties in whom Hitler's influence, in getting around is unavoidable; as that it should sometimes fail to get across at all. There is just nothing the Post Office department or the public can do about it.

There is, however, another cause of delay, and a second cause of delay, which may be due to the caution on the part of the writers of letters and the senders of parcels.

The department complains in turn that a good many letters and parcels are not correctly addressed, hence there is great difficulty in getting around, in whom they should be delivered, and sometimes that is absolutely impossible.

Interruptions of the service so caused can be ironed out if writers and senders take care to address their letters and parcels exactly as they are instructed to do.

The more he scatters his forces, the more vigorously and relentlessly can the Royal Air Force pour away at Germany.

Once Germany's overseas empire becomes uncontrollable, the whole Axis empire will collapse. Germany is still the heart and nerve centre of the Axis federation.

There is historical precedent plenty for such an African campaign. The Dark Continent would be world control if Hitler could.

It is the continent of empires. And by some mysterious process of conquistadorism, no ambitious emperor has ever been able to express the notion that upon African soil he can establish an empire which would eventually be established some time that would rule the world.

This idea obsessed Alexander. It obsessed the Czar. It filled the mind of Napoleon. It was one of his aims.

Yet, whenever tried it in any age, came inevitably to grief. Not beyond possibility that Adolf Hitler may find his Nemesis and his grave in some wild foray into the heart of Africa.

Amerks Get Their Revenge

NEW YORK, Nov. 25.—(CP)—New York Americans outlasted Montreal Canadiens Sunday night for a 2-1 National Hockey League victory, the first win for the Amerks since the New York Yanks had won a game at Madison Square Garden this season.

Canadiens, who had won throughout the first two periods, staged a powerful attack in the third which earned them a goal by Tony Demers on a solo pass.

The Americans, seeking revenge for the 2-1 defeat Saturday, gave them a 2-1 lead Saturday night through two second-period goals.

The first went to Peanor O'Farrell, a 10-second goal, and the second to Wiff Fazio's passout. Then, Charlie Conacher scored on one of the old-timers' two goals.

The loss put Canadiens back in the league cellar.

The Amerks, who had minor injuries, Bill Benoit and Pat Egan of America, needed attention for head cuts, both caused by collisions with Ken Biedenbach and Domenic LaPietra.

Another Draw Chalked Up

DETROIT, Nov. 25.—(CP)—Detroit Red Wings went through their sixth consecutive National Hockey League game without a win Sunday, their first loss on a road trip for a 1-1 overtime tie with Boston Bruins.

The tying goal, scored in the third period by Syd Howe drew a storm of protest from the Bruins, who charged the Red Wings with holding up the shot clock. Referee Frank Clancy, who the press stuck the hand of on Clapper, Boston defensives, was reflected in the net.

The Bruins, who appeared tired from their three-game road trip, were outkicked in the opening period when Detroit threatened him.

NEW YORK, Nov. 25.—(CP)—Two goals by Roy Conacher and a defensive effort by Frank Bremner and defenceman Dil Clapier gave Boston Bruins a 2-1 victory over New York Rangers Saturday night. It was the first defeat this season for the Rangers.

Conacher scored half way through the first period on a three-man rush with Mel Hill and Bill Gadsden against the Rangers. In the second period, with the game tied 1-1, he gave him a pass. Gadsden was to play with Frank Hollister in a short shot on a power play with five men up.
